BEFORE DIVERS EVER ENTER THE WATER, THEY CAN FACE MAJOR DIFFICULTIES.

Equipment failures and shipyard accidents, among other things, may prevent them from doing their jobs, putting the crew and company at risk. It's the role of companies that specialize in diver insurance to leverage their expertise and create policies tailored for diving tasks. While generalists can cover some risks, many of these providers don't have the requisite industry knowledge to provide proper support for high-risk activities.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that heavy and civil engineering made up for the largest percent of commercial diver employment as of May 2014. Throughout the country, the Gulf states of Florida, Louisiana and Texas employed the most divers. In particular, the New Orleans-Metairie-Kenner metropolitan region boasted the highest employment level. Companies operating out of these or other highly active areas may need tailored insurance support from specialists. In fact, commercial diving contractors working anywhere in the United States or even other countries can count on us to help them obtain the coverages they need.

Fisk Marine Insurance knows the insurance needs of commercial divers and can base policies off of specific industry factors. This includes knowledge of relevant legislation like the Jones Act, which can address the relationship between a diver and his or her employer and the conditions that determine who is at fault for an injury.

Here are three more reasons why we at Fisk Marine are the best at what we do, and qualified to provide the best insurance solution for commercial diving contractors:

1. Specific coverage options

FISK MARINE INSURANCE IS FOCUSED
IN A WAY THAT MAKES IT STAND OUT FROM THE COMPETITION.

As our site states, the broad category of commercial diving insurance may also apply to construction equipment, diving suits and the Remote Operated Vehicles used in exploration. Few other firms worldwide have our level of experience in these fields.

Required tasks can vary, even within categories of commercial diving. Industrial divers could be required to operate welding equipment, explosives or other dangerous equipment while submerged, but they could also simply perform low level surveying. Marine employers may do their staff a disservice when they don't find an insurance provider with tight enough industry focus.

Our customized insurance products and pricing stem from the specifics of each job and reflects clear understanding of relative value. We know the tools commercial diving operations need and the resources they have at their disposal, and are also aware of the changes to laws that affect regular operation and dive team best practices. As a leading provider among insurance agents and brokers, Fisk Marine approaches custom policies with the concerns divers are likely to face in mind, and can help operators worry less about potential gaps in coverage.

2. Excellence in our field

SIMILARLY, OUR COMMITMENT TO HELPING COMMERCIAL DIVERS SHOWS HOW SERIOUSLY WE TAKE THEIR CREWMEMBER WELL-BEING.

Our commitment to helping commercial divers shows how seriously we take their crewmember well-being.

Working closely with the contractor allows us to factor in the many types of projects divers work on. Moreover, client appreciation has led us to develop a reputation of excellence. We can adapt to different industries as well, to satisfy industries as diverse as energy exploration and oceanographic research.

In addition, customers may be surprised to learn we offer life, health and disability coverage, including medical, dental and retirement plans. These categories come with features that will change depending on the employee, as well as the industry requirements. Our work with these products is another thing that distinguishes us from less focused providers.

While we understand the conditions that affect most commercial diving operations, we also provide the same level of comprehensiveness to all client industries. With more than 25 years of experience working in 46 different states, Fisk Marine has a strong history to draw from when writing policies.
